Junior high school students should be allowed to use their own smartphones at school for their safety and to help with their studies. First, if children carry smartphones, parents can feel safe because they can find where children are, thanks to smartphones. Junior high school students are so busy with their studies as well as extra-curricular activities. They often have to be at school until it gets dark, which could make their parents anxious.

Secondly, junior high school students are responsible enough to have their own smartphones, which will help them explore their study subjects and manage their busy schedules at school. In conclusion, smartphones can help students to stay safe and study better.

<CON>

Junior high school students should not use their smartphones at school, because they do not need them, and smartphones could cause problems.

First, all the Japanese junior high schools have computers for each of the students, so the students do not need their own device. Second, junior high school students are likely to get distracted by playing smartphone games during class. They might even get addicted to them, and end up spending so much time and money on smartphones, which might lead to some crimes. Allowing students to use mobiles at school is too risky.

To conclude, junior high schools had better not allow their students to bring their smartphones or use them in class.
