I think the government should take action to solve this problem. First, some medical problems are very serious, such as diseases like cancer or HIV, that need treatment very often, so you need doctors close by for this. Second in an emergency, it may be too far to go to a big city if a person is dying or seriously wounded. I think it will save many more lives by having more doctors in small towns for people who are too far from good medical care in the big city.

I do not think the government should send more doctors to small towns and villages. If the government pushes doctors to go to countryside villages, the doctors will do a poor job because they were forced to go, not because they chose to go there. Also, the medical equipment will be poor, and the doctors will lose motivation, always caring for elderly people. Finally doctors may get angry and leave the small villages and go back to the cities because of feeling bored, so the village people will again need a doctor.
