Tourism is growing around the world, and it has a big effect on both people and nature. Japan is a popular place for tourists, and we can see these effects there. First, when too many tourists visit, it can make things difficult for local people and places. In cities like Kyoto, famous places get very crowded. This can cause traffic jams, a lot of noise, and make it harder for people who live there to enjoy their own city because there are so many visitors. Second, the environment can get hurt. More visitors mean more trash and more pollution from cars and planes. Beautiful natural places, like the paths around Mount Fuji, can get dirty with garbage, which harms their natural beauty. It's important to find a way for tourism to be good for everyone and everything. (137 words)

Tourism has many positive impacts on society and the environment in Japan. Firstly, tourism is a major boost to Japan's economy. The money spent by visitors on hotels, food, shopping, and transportation creates many jobs for local people. This economic activity helps businesses grow and provides income that supports communities across the country. Secondly, tourism plays a crucial role in promoting cultural exchange and understanding. When people from different countries visit Japan, they learn about its unique traditions, history, and way of life. This interaction also allows Japanese people to learn about other cultures, fostering mutual respect and friendship on a global scale. It also encourages the preservation of cultural heritage as it becomes a valuable attraction. (117 words)
